Miscellaneous.

A Cook Upon Trial.

After many fiascos we did get a woman to come by the week on trial, and she is with us now. She said that it was absurd to take that precaution, because he was sure that nature had intended her to suit us for our lives long. But I am glad we did take it, nevertheless. She could cook everything, she said. She would not, I believe, have hesitated to aver her proficiency to cook human flesh, if my questions had taken that direction. She also promised to do all that was asked of her in other respects. Altogether, she was and is the most cheerful, as well as the most tremendous liar with whom I have ever been acquainted. On the occasion of the first little dinner she gave my wife and me, I said: "Spare for nothing, Mrs. Bonne Femme, but send up everything of your best." I took no luncheon that day, but reserved my appetite for the trial feast. This was lucky, for nungur was, upon that occasion, not merely the best sauce, but the only one. A sharp kitchen maid could have turned out a better dinner. Everything was spoiled that wasn't boiled—as if one wanted boiled things! But the curious part of the affair was, that the wretched impostor below stairs was of opinion that she had acquitted herself to admiration. She especially prided her elf, it seems, upon her "sweets," her single specimen of which was comprised of a sago-pudding, with some jam split upon it. And yet this woman had a character with her that, if it did not quite corroborate her own assertions, gave some ground for them. People talk of the wickedness of servants, but what is that compared to the wickedness of those mistresses who will say anything in order to get smoothly rid of a worthless cook? Of course it is a temptation, but it is one that a lady ought to resist; for the oil that smooths the parting lubricates into an unsuspecting family, just as it did in our case. It is true, I only engaged Mrs. Bonne Femme for "a week certain;" but here she is and here she sticks. She brought three boxes with her [one of them the size of the Ark], asserting that she was sure to suit, and might, therefore, just as well make herself comfortable at once. She continues to state that she does well, and is so good as to add that for her part she finds the place to her liking. In vain I have told her that she is not cook enough for us (and indeed she is not cook at all); she only shakes her head and smiles, as though I was charmingly dull. She won't go, and I don't know how to make her. I have been looking into "Barn's Justice," but I can't find that I have a remedy against her. The police, of course, decline to interfere, except in her favor, and I dare not call in the military, on account of the "young ladies' maid," and the other girls. It is sad to be without a cook, but it is worse to possess a bad one, who refuses to leave your room, and assures you she is quite comfortable where she is. I have said she can cook nothing, but there I exaggerate. Although our weekly bills have never been so high as since she has been with us, it is impossible to convict her of petty
